I'm looking to work with a quant fund in the future. I don't want to get into quant investing if the fund does not have an ethical code in place. So I would like to know what rules the quant fund will use when making a trade? For example, I can make the trade based on the market conditions. Is that immoral to me? I want to make a trade but it is based on what the market conditions are. A: What do you mean by "ethical code"? Most quant hedge funds do not have any ethical code at all. They are about generating returns for the management and investors. They may do so by investing in a way that would be perfectly ethical, and doing so may have made them a big profit. So, no, there is not an ethical code. There are hundreds of quant hedge funds, and the number keeps growing. If you want to work at one of them, you will have to decide for yourself what you agree with, and how much ethics is important for you. A: Quant hedge funds generally do not have an ethical code as they are an entity or a platform that analyses financial markets and tries to make money from the analysis. They are profit-oriented and as such do not really have a "code". In general, quant hedge funds operate according to the following principle, where the quant component basically means a higher level of "meta" analysis (i.e. understanding the market better than the layman does). If you believe that one trade will lead to a higher return, go for it. If you believe that one trade will lead to a higher return, go for it. If you believe that one trade will lead to a lower return, then don't go for it. If you believe that one trade will lead to a lower return, then don't go for it. If you believe that one trade will have no effect, then don't go for it. If you go by the above principles, you can probably argue that quant hedge funds don't break any rules. /*
