softwareEfficacy and tolerance of ticlopidine in aplastic anaemia.

Ticlopidine, an oral platelet aggregation inhibitor, has been administered to 12 patients with severe aplastic anaemia. The dose schedule was a daily dose of 200 mg for seven consecutive days, then 50 mg daily for the next 21 consecutive days and 50 mg twice weekly for the last 20 days. Nine patients received treatment before allogeneic stem cell transplantation (alloSCT). Bone marrow failed to recover in two patients. One patient died of bronchopneumonia after the first 7 days of treatment. The other patient was treated for 6 months. A reduction in the platelet count to less than 50,000/microl after one week of ticlopidine administration was observed in 12 patients. A rebound in the platelet count after 14 days was observed in 11 patients. In one patient, the platelet count was maintained at more than 100,000/microl for 8 months. All patients tolerated treatment well and no adverse reactions were observed.

Ticlopidine might have some efficacy in aplastic anaemia and should be investigated further.
