Field of the Invention This invention relates to an improved process for the reduction of nitrogen oxides in exhaust gases and an improved catalyst for carrying out this process. 2. Description of the Prior Art The reduction of nitrogen oxides contained in exhaust gases is essential for the prevention of air pollution. Exhaust gases are commonly brought into contact with an active catalyst before being discharged into the atmosphere, and a variety of active catalysts for this purpose have been proposed. The most common active catalyst material is a transition metal such as platinum or palladium carried on a suitable support such as a refractory metal oxide, preferably of the type which is itself highly active as a catalyst. Processes for the treatment of exhaust gases by contact with a catalyst such as this are used extensively in industry, and are increasingly being employed on a more large scale. In order to improve the effectiveness of such processes and to increase the selectivity for the reduction of nitrogen oxides, it has become necessary to develop materials having enhanced activity. Some attempts have been made to improve the activity of active catalysts. For example, in Japanese Patent Application No. 3727/1978, now Japanese Patent Publication No. 25053/1979, there is proposed a catalyst consisting of platinum or palladium carried on a refractory metal oxide of high surface area. However, although the selectivity of this catalyst for the reduction of nitrogen oxides is very high, its
