In general it might be said, that when a piece of writing is not to be judged in the light of mere sense or sense-reflexion, but to be considered as a whole, it will be of advantage to have sentiments of the highest class. But there is one person who is not likely to make this error, and that is the Editor. No critic can properly and dispassionately judge a work of art by comparison with other works, unless they are of the same kind. But the most intelligent critic is a true judge, when, having once made up his mind on the excellence or defect of a work, he is not to be induced to change, even by argument. Such a judgement does honour to his own judgment, and has no further share in his wisdom than that of the painter or sculptor, to whom it is due. On the other hand, the artist requires that the critic should be perfectly indifferent; for it is by reflection that he becomes a critic, and the same reflection which he has employed on one occasion, will furnish him with the means of judging of another. [paragraph continues] We have been asked to consider the supposed merits and defects of the Lord of the Rings as a whole. We have done so; we have said what we have said, and have nothing more to add. But we may say in conclusion, that we have praised the novel in terms of its own quality, and so far the fault of the Author has not been felt. We have to add the apology, that we have said
